Bomb Designed to Kill Newsman, Police Say

BY BILL HAZLETT

Times Staff Writer

PHOENIX—A sophisticated, mercury-activated bomb was used in the Mafia-style murder attempt that maimed investigative reporter Don Bolles, The Times learned Friday.

The device, consisting of about four sticks of dynamite and apparently attached to the underside of Bolles' car by a magnet, was detonated by a battery-powered mercury switch, critically injuring the 47-year-old reporter for the Arizona Republic Wednesday night.

The device was triggered when the car's movement caused the mercury to roll forward, completing an electrical circuit.

"It was definitely a 'kill hit,' planned by somebody who wanted to do a number on Bolles and not just injure or maim him," said Homicide Sgt. Bill Dowdy of the Phoenix police department.

Dowdy said there was very little doubt that the bombing was an organized crime "hit."

Until about a month ago, when he was reassigned to his newspaper's capital bureau, Bolles had been an extremely cautious reporter, Dowdy said.

"He'd put a piece of transparent tape on the hood of his car so he could tell if it had been opened," Dowdy said.

"He'd been threatened any number of times and he just wasn't one to take chances. Then he apparently relaxed and they got him."

The explosion mangled Bolles' lower body, forcing amputation of his right leg, and riddled him with shrapnel.

Bolles, father of seven children, is in critical but stable condition in St. Joseph's Hospital here after five hours of surgery and treatment on a dialysis machine following kidney failure.

Despite his condition, Sgt. Dowdy said, Bolles is attempting to assist investigators in their search for the bomber.

"He can only nod yes or no to our questions, but he gave us two or three pretty good leads," Dowdy said.

Right after he was blown out of his car he told the paramedics that if he died he had been working on a story involving the Mafia, a sports concessionaire, and John Henry Adamson, police said.

Adamson, object of a two-day search by police, surrendered to Phoenix police early Friday after his attorney, Stephen Scott, negotiated the arrangement.

"He refused to make any statements on the advice of his lawyer and was booked into county jail on an old misdemeanor charge of defrauding an innkeeper," Dowdy said.

"We haven't filed any charges against him, so he'll be in and out, but he did agree to remain in contact with the department."

Bolles, an investigative reporter for the Arizona Republic since 1962, had been investigating organized crime and sports concessions in Arizona for several years, according to fellow reporters.

In addition to his work on organized crime, Bolles had written numerous stories dealing with major land frauds, white-collar crimes, Mafia infiltration of legitimate businesses in Phoenix and a recent surge of Mafia-controlled prostitution, gambling and pornography in this area.

At the time of the bombing, according to his coworkers, Bolles was investigating a story that reportedly involved a sports concessionaire and at least two Arizona politicians.

Phoenix bomb technicians, working with FBI agents and explosives experts from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, theorized that the bombing of Bolles' car was the work of "somebody who knew a lot about bombs."

"There's very little doubt about it being an organized crime hit," said Dowdy, "but most of those people don't like to work with mercury switches because they're too damned tricky."

One investigator said the magnet-equipped bomb could have been attached to Bolles' car in seconds.

Newsman Shows Recovery Signs

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — Arizona Republic reporter Don Bolles showed the first signs of recovering Friday from a bomb blast which tore off his right leg, as a key witness surrendered to police but refused to be questioned about the attack.

John Adamson, 32, turned himself in on a 1975 warrant for defrauding an innkeeper in suburban Scottsdale. He was released on $100 bond.

Bolles, an investigative reporter who had written several stories about organized crime, was lured to a midtown hotel Wednesday by a caller using Adamson's name, police said. Bolles received a telephone call in the lobby, went to his car and started to drive out of a parking lot when the bomb exploded.

Before he went to the Clarendon House Hotel, Bolles left a note for fellow reporters at the State Capitol pressroom saying he was going to meet Adamson, who had offered information on Rep. Sam Steiger of Arizona. Steiger said he does not know why his name was used.

Adamson is former operator of a towing service, police said. Bolles identified a photograph of Adamson for detectives, Thursday, police said.

The bomb was placed beneath driver's seat. In Bolles' car, possibly in the few minutes Bolles was in the hotel looking for Adamson, an investigator said.

Paramedics who aided Bolles said he told them he was working on a Mafia story, and mentioned Adamson as well as Emprise Corp. Emprise, a Buffalo, N.Y., sports concessionaire once owned a half-interest in Arizona's six dog tracks and the Prescott Downs horse track.

Bombing Suspect Hears Testimony

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — "John Adamson sent me ... John Adamson called me here," mumbled a bleeding and critically injured reporter after a bomb ripped through his car on June 2, a police detective testified Monday.

The testimony came at the opening of a preliminary hearing for John Harvey Adamson, 32, of Phoenix, who is charged with murdering Arizona Republic reporter Don Bolles. The hearing was expected to wind up Tuesday.

Adamson, handcuffed and wearing jeans and a sheriff's department T-shirt, sat emotionless throughout most of the day-long hearing.

Homicide detective George Klettinger, the initial witness, was one of the first officers to arrive at the Hotel Clarendon parking lot after the bomb went off under Bolles' car. Bolles died 11 days later.

Bolles had told colleagues he was going to the hotel to meet Adamson and to discuss information allegedly linking political figures to a dubious land deal. That meeting never took place and, as Bolles was backing out of the hotel parking lot, the bomb blew through the bottom of his small car. Police said the bomb, believed to have been dynamite, was triggered by radio control.

Also called to testify was Gail Owens of Phoenix, who said she accompanied Adamson to San Diego on April 20, where police allege he purchased a remote control mechanism similar to the one used to touch off the bomb in Bolles' car.

The hearing, held under extremely tight security before Justice of the Peace Martin Reno, was shifted to a larger court room to accommodate spectators and reporters.

The defense had sought unsuccessfully to have the hearing closed to the public.

Witness Links Suspect to Bomb Slaying of Newman

PHOENIX—The prime suspect in the car bomb murder of reporter Don Bolles said he received $10,000 to plant the bomb and expressed surprise it didn't kill Bolles outright, a preliminary hearing was told Monday.

"That was a hell of a charge under that car," John Adamson was quoted as saying. "I can't understand how the man lived. If I ever get (blow up) another foreign car, I'm going to make damn sure it's not a Datsun."

Adamson was bound over for trial on a murder charge after the testimony by Robert Lettiere, a business partner, and other witnesses at a hearing that lasted until almost midnight.

Bolles, a prize-winning investigative reporter for the Arizona Republic, died 11 days after a bomb blasted his auto. Surgeons amputated both legs and an arm in the attempt to save him.

Bolles told paramedics at the scene that he was working on a story about the Mafia and "they got me" and "Adamson set me up."

Lettiere, a partner of Adamson in a greyhound racing enterprise, has two felony convictions on his record and was promised immunity from prosecution for his testimony.

He said he saw dynamite in Adamson's storeroom six months ago. On May 28, Lettiere testified, Adamson told him he was going "to blow up a car."

Lettiere said he and Adamson went to the newspaper's parking lot, looking for Bolles' Datsun, but Adamson said, "I couldn't do anything here anyway."

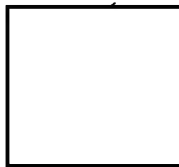

It was only then, Lettiere said, that he asked, "You mean there's going to be someone in the car when you blow it up?"

He said Adamson replied: "That's right" and told him "some people don't like this guy," Bolles.

They drove to a Datsun dealer where Adamson checked over the same model Bolles owned, Lettiere said.

Lettiere said he took Adamson's claims "with a grain of salt."

Five days later, the bomb exploded when Bolles returned to his car. He had told colleagues he was supposed to meet Adamson.

Lettiere said Adamson appeared at his house the next day seeking shelter and allegedly asked: "You didn't believe me, did you? . . . Now you know. When I say I'm going to do something I'm going to do it."

He quoted Adamson as saying "my people" would "be behind me and would take care of court costs." Adamson said he got $10,000 and had been promised $25,000 for any future "job," said Lettiere.

Gail Owens, 30, identified as a girlfriend, testified she accompanied Adamson to San Diego April 20, and they went to a hobby shop where Adamson bought a radio control device for operating a model plane.

Police have said the bomb under Bolles' car was detonated by a signal from such a device.

Slain Arizona newsman latest crime-plague victim

By ROBERT LINDSEY
New York Times Service

PHOENIX — Under the gaze of a sweltering desert sun, a hybrid breed of organized crime — including Mafia-style emigres from elsewhere and a homegrown species of seemingly respectable business and professional men — is blossoming in Arizona, the nation's fastest-growing state.

Largely through vast fraudulent land deals, securities frauds and other, often related, "white collar crimes," criminal groups are turning over many millions of dollars a year in illicit profits, bringing gangland-style violence to this fast-urban-izing frontier state and provoking unresolved charges of official corruption.

On June 2, Don Bolles, 47, a reporter for the Arizona Republic who had written about land-fraud schemes and criminal entry into legitimate businesses, was fatally injured by a remote-control bomb that blew apart his car and left him without legs and with only one arm. Bolles died Sunday morning in a Phoenix hospital.

The motives for the murder are still not clear. But police here have said that their investigation has involved "prominent, influential people."

The bombing was the third gangland-style murder in the past 15 months. The others involved a key witness in a land-fraud prosecution, who was murdered on the eve of his appearance before a grand jury, and a mafioso.

For the hundreds of thousands of people who have flocked to this warm climate from the cold, decaying cities of the urban North, the incidents have provided brutal evidence that urban crime has followed them into the so-called "Sunbelt," the fast-developing Southern tier of the country.

"There's a great deal of money in Arizona, and when you have a great deal of money, you have a fertile field for organized crime," said Kevin O'Malley, a lawyer for the Justice Department's Organized Crime Strike Force.

But he and other law enforcement officials emphasize that "organized crime" does not necessarily mean Eastern-style Mafia mobsters.

In his few moments of consciousness after the bombing, Bolles whispered the words "Mafia" and "Emprise." The latter is a sports conglomerate with headquarters in Buffalo, N.Y., that has sometimes been accused of links to organized crime.

Lt. Glenn Sparks of the intelligence division of the Phoenix Police Department said there "are about 50 or more known associates" of Mafia gangsters living in the Phoenix area and that many had acquired holdings here in restaurants, bars, hotels and other businesses.

Police say they are not working on the theory that the killing was necessarily linked to old-fashioned organized crime. They say they are investigating the possible participation of prominent local business and professional men who, they say, have deep involvement in land and securities fraud, and who may have alliances with conventional organized crime figures.

Police say they have sought for at least three years to prosecute what they say is widespread selling of worthless Arizona property in this country and abroad, and worthless mortgages and securities that they say are a source of many tens of millions of dollars in illegal profits annually. But they say they have been frustrated by official resistance at higher levels.

Police made available to the New York Times a transcript of a secretly recorded conversation in which a senior prosecutorial official of Maricopa County answers police complaints of why the office had not been more aggressive in pursuing the land-fraud cases.

He says on the recording that he has not been able to prosecute cases because of what he called a power "coalition" of interests that blocked such prosecutions and kept his staff too small to be effective.

On the purported tape-recording transcript, this official cited a well-known businessman and Republican Party leader here who, he said, headed the "coalition" and who himself appeared to have become involved recently in local prostitution.

"You can't get work done," the voice of the man described as the county official said. "Cases get thrown out of court, and you don't understand why. And the reason is very simple." He then said, in an explanation sprinkled with profanity, that "the lid is on ... all the way from the very top."

This official subsequently conceded that he had had a sexual affair with a secretary employed by two land companies that he was supposedly investigating, and police here assert he was being blackmailed by the companies as a result of the affair.

Other officials here say that they have met puzzling resistance in the legislature to proposals designed to reduce the abuses related to the sale of remote, underdeveloped properties on a sight-unseen basis.

Nevertheless, partly because of an avalanche of complaints from the residents and public officials of other states about land fraud here, the legislature created a statewide grand jury that will convene for the first time today.

Land fraud takes several forms. It generally starts with high-pressure sales campaigns in the colder, northern states of this country and in foreign countries — Germany, Lichtenstein, Japan, the Philippine Islands and other places — offering an acre of Arizona desert for $2,000 to $3,000 or so.

Usually the parcels are grossly misrepresented in attractive sales brochures promising idyllic lakes, roads and plentiful water that seldom exists.

Then, a circuitous "paper trail" begins. Mortgages signed by these buyers are sold to other members of the public at attractive rates. However, the buyers often default on their payments when they realize the purchase was a mistake, leaving the mortgage-buyers holding the bag.

Often the promoters use the buyers' promissory notes as collateral to get inflated loans at banks, sometimes using conspirators inside financial institutions, or they create a maze of corporate shells that repeatedly sell the land at progressively higher prices.

WITH FALSELY inflated values, they then obtain bank loans or sell the mortgages at many times their actual worth.

In Arizona, sales exploded in the late 60s and early 70s, and Phoenix police zeroed in on Nathan Waxman, a former convict who moved here in the early 1960s and changed his name to Ned Warren.

He began mixing with some of the top members of the Phoenix social and political set and was soon known to be the controlling force behind at least a dozen companies, including the Great Southwest Land and Cattle Co., the Queen Creek Land and Cattle Corp. and Consolidated Mortgage Co.

Police repeatedly tried to prosecute Warren and his associates, but to its frustration its case against him never came to trial, partly because of the murder of Warren's chief aide, Edward Lazar, on the day before he was scheduled to testify before a county grand jury about activities of the land corporations.

SUBSEQUENTLY, however, O'Malley and other federal prosecutors moved into the case, and last fall, Warren and his son-in-law were convicted of extortion not directly related to the land fraud charges. They were sentenced to 12 years in federal jail. However, they appealed and are on bail.

Bolles, the reporter, had written repeatedly about Warren's activities and served to prod the police action. He revealed among other things how the son of the then real estate commissioner, J. Fred Talley, was in Warren's employ and suggested that Talley was taking bribes. Talley died of an apparent heart attack while under investigation.

Gary Nelson, who was Arizona attorney general from 1968 to 1974, and who is now a state appellate court judge, is currently the subject of a federal grand jury investigation concerning alleged income tax evasion that some authorities say may or may not be related to the land business.

THE NAME of Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., has twice cropped up in the current investigation.

Friends said that on the day Bolles was attacked, he had been on his way to a meeting with John Adamson, an informant who said he had information about a land transaction involving Goldwater, Rep. Sam Steiger, a Republican who is now running for the seat of Sen. Paul J. Fannin, and Harry Rosensweig, a jeweler and Republican leader here.

Adamson, 32, an owner of greyhound racing dogs, has become a key figure in the investigation. Police sources said that the possible use of the three political leaders' names to draw Bolles to a meeting did not in itself mean anything, because, as one detective said, "What better way would there be to get a reporter to go someplace you wanted him to than to say some big names in government are involved in a crooked deal?"

SUBSEQUENTLY, the Arizona Republic published copies of letters written in 1971 by Goldwater and Steiger on their official stationery endorsing one of Warren's projects, called Chino Valley Ranchettes, that was offered to American servicemen abroad under terms that violated Arizona law.

The Phoenix Police Department said it had evidence that the actual wording of the letter had been drafted by Lazar.

The letters were used in sales promotion of the land, which police later found to be without water and with rock conditions, that made installation of functioning septic tanks impossible.

Spokesmen for Goldwater and Steiger have denied participation in any land deals and said that the 1971 letters apparently represented a normal response to a request from a constituent. Rosensweig has also denied participation in any questionable land arrangements.

Authorities say they believe relatively small numbers of Mafia gangsters have expanded their base in Arizona in recent years and in some cases appear to be competing with indigenous criminal elements.

BUT THEY say it is not clear at this point to what extent, if any, they have allied themselves with the local "white collar" businessmen suspected in the Bolles attack.

Two well-known Mafia leaders, both in their 70s, have lived in Tucson, 125 miles south of here, for more than 20 years. They are Joseph Bonnano-Sr., a one-time prominent New York City Mafioso, and Peter Licavoli Sr.

Although both are said to be retired, Licavoli was arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last month and accused of attempting to sell a 15th century painting that had been stolen in Cincinnati to a FBI undercover agent.

Last October, another mafioso, Louis Bombaci no, who had turned government informer, had been given a new life here and then entered the local underworld, got in his 10-day-old, 1976 Lincoln and started to back it up. The car exploded and killed him.

THE MURDER is still unsolved, and authorities say it is uncertain whether he was a victim of Mafia retaliation for having turned informant or as a result of his gambling and other activities here.

Arizona's land business is huge, with some 7,500 subdivisions now for sale in Arizona.

Phoenix Police Sgt. Lonzo McCracken, who broke the original case against Warren, asserts candidly, "I'm disgusted. As far as I'm concerned, the whole system of regulating these developments is corrupt. You've got corruption all over the place."

Citing an estimate that Arizona land fraud had already cost the public about $500 million in the last decade, Dr. James Johnson, an associate professor of Arizona State University, who has made an extensive study of organized crime activities here, said, "Land fraud is a huge industry, and organized crime is deeply involved."

BUT, HE continued, "organized crime" involved not only the classical mobster, but also lawyers, bank officers and business-suited promoters who in some cases appear to have formed alliances with the mobsters.

Federal, state and local investigators are pursuing the case of Bolles, and many of the names that have surfaced in the investigation are those of lawyers or businessmen who have been active in the land business.

In several cases, they are people who have been linked to Adamson and Warren, who are themselves associates.

Some police intelligence sources say they believe they have evidence that the attraction of a fast-growing population has created a battleground between old-line crooked businessmen and the out-of-state newcomers.

Calls by Suspect in Bomb Slaying Probed by Police

BY BILL HAZLETT
Times Staff Writer

A series of telephone calls from San Diego to Phoenix placed by John Harvey Adamson, suspected bomb slayer of Arizona newspaper reporter Don Bolles, is being investigated by Phoenix homicide detectives.

The calls were made between April 20 and 28 while Adamson was staying at the King's Inn in San Diego with Mrs. Gail Owens, 30-year-old divorcee identified as the murder suspect's girlfriend.

During Adamson's preliminary hearing in Phoenix, Mrs. Owens testified she accompanied Adamson to a San Diego hobby shop where he bought a radio control device for operating model airplanes.

Phoenix crime laboratory technicians said such a device—known as an "E-K logictrol"—was used to detonate the June 2 blast that maimed Bolles, costing him both legs and his right arm, before he died 11 days later.

The 47-year-old reporter whispered Adamson's name to passersby and paramedics in his last few minutes of consciousness after the blast, police said.

Adamson, 32, was bound over for trial on a murder charge after the preliminary hearing and ordered held without bail pending arraignment Friday in Superior Court.

However, a hearing is scheduled Friday on a defense request that bail be set for Adamson.

Adamson's court-appointed attorneys filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, maintaining that their client was not charged with first-degree murder but on an open charge of murder for which bail cannot be denied.

Meanwhile, the detectives, headed by Capt. Don Lozier, are checking out the telephone numbers—most of them unlisted—Adamson called more than a dozen times from his San Diego motel.

Lozier refused to discuss the telephone numbers or their significance in the Bolles bombing probe.

The Times learned, however, that among those called in Phoenix were attorneys Neal Roberts and Mickey E. Clifton.

Other calls were made to a medical supply firm where Adamson's wife works, to two of Adamson's personal friends, one to a personal friend of Mrs. Owens, and at least two to the Ivanhoe Cocktail Lounge in North Phoenix.

Clifton represented Adamson June 14 on a 1975 misdemeanor charge of defrauding an innkeeper in connection with an unpaid $61.44 hotel bill.

Roberts, the other attorney, told Phoenix detectives he was with Adamson on June 2, less than 30 minutes before the powerful dynamite bomb exploded beneath Bolles' car as he backed out of a parking lot.

The attorney said he met Adamson at the Ivanhoe Cocktail Lounge about 10 a.m. on the morning Bolles was ambushed.

During a June 8 interview, Roberts told police he was with Adamson and Henry J. (Hank) Landry, 42, a New York ex-convict and professional gambler also identified as a key figure in the bombing inquiry, until about 20 minutes before the bomb exploded at 11:34 a.m. "We left my office a few minutes after 11," Roberts told police, "I took Hank with me to the airport and John (Adamson) left."

Roberts' law office is about a five-minute drive from the Clarendon House Hotel where the bombing occurred, police said.

Detectives said Roberts told them he could provide an alibi for Landry at the time of the bombing, because the two men were together from about 10 a.m. until 2 p.m. that day.

Although the exact motive for the Bolles murder has not been revealed, Lozier earlier said his detectives have uncovered several possible explanations involving "a number of politically prominent and influential people" with important connections throughout Arizona.

Lozier said his detectives believe they have identified most of the key conspirators in the Bolles murder and have talked to several of them.

"We have a number of reasons for not making more arrests at this time," Lozier said, but he declined to elaborate.

Phoenix detectives are prohibited from discussing the bombing inquiry because of a news blackout imposed on the case by the Maricopa County prosecutor's office.

Reporter Undergoes Third Amputation

PHOENIX (UPI) — Surgeons Thursday amputated the left leg of investigative reporter Don Bolles, who earlier lost his right leg and arm to a bomb planted in his car while he was working on a story about organized crime.

Bolles, 47, was reported in grave condition today at St. Joseph's Hospital.

Doctors feared for his life after amputating his right arm Tuesday, saying there was doubt he could survive the night, but he rallied and his vital signs were listed as stable today.

Bolles, of the Arizona Republic, was asked to meet a tipster at the Hotel Flarendon June 2. The tipster did not show up and when Bolles returned to his auto, a bomb planted under the car body beneath the driver's seat exploded, hurling him through the door. His shattered right leg was amputated immediately and his right arm was amputated when he developed an infection.

There was "no alternative" but to amputate the left leg too, surgeons said Thursday, to halt the spread of the infection.
